Wolfpack Tribalism

From the resistance movement to the provisional states

The topic of "organizing" has been subject to debate in NS (as well as wider RW) circles since I first became involved in the movement over a decade ago. It should come as no surprise that RWers absolutely suck at organization, at least compared to the left. This is due to two reasons, firstly that most of the right comes from pro-status quo conservative background. Before the first Trump administration, RWers did not protest or organize into political action groups. This is opposed to the left, which has plenty of experience & infrastructure in place already. The second, & more important, reason is that the leftist allied government actively works against any RW orgnization. Even moderate conservative groups came to be targetted by the FBI's COINTELPRO operations. The NGO complex, which may not be part of the government but is most certainly an organ of the System, plays an important role here. Organizations like the SPLC or HopeNotHate.

For those who were not present at the time, plenty of organizations popped up during the AltRight era from about 2015 to 17. Identity Evropa, Proud Boys, Patriot Prayer & Vanguard America to name a few of the most notable. These groups were considered "far-right extremists" by the media at the time, even the GOP/Trump campaign refused to show any support. They also numbered in the hundreds & managed to bring out sizable groups at protests & other events, often with uniforms & without masks. This era of the movement culminated in the 2017 Unite the Right rally in Charlottesville, VA.

The rally was poorly planned, both because of lack of experience & the fact that the movement leaders of the time were (& are) retards. The police & local government also actively worked to sabotage the event & provoke violence from the huge counter-protest. The only good that came out of the protest is a leftist eating the bumper of a Dodge Challenger & two staties dying in a helicopter crash. The infamous battles of Berkely & Portland were similarly poorly planned, as fun as it was to watch Antifa fags get their shit rocked.

The failures of the AltRight, including the practice of doxxing & attempting to ruin the lives of anyone with vaguely RW opinions led to many being extremely suspicious of joining any groups. The almost entirely online nature of the RW at the time also led to many individuals being thousands of miles from their ideological friends. Even Atomwaffen Division, which was a single organization on paper, was functionally a few regional & unconnected groups that shared a logo. The Terrorgram era, which developed after the crackdowns on AWD & The Base, eschewed any organization in favor of leaderless resistance. Where I believe this was misguided is in the focus on lone wolf violence without any specific goal. What they lacked is a vanguard element to actually support, or any political element. This violence is fine for acceleration but doesn't help much with advancing our cause, especially since many of the saints failed to achieve the high scores of men like Brenton Tarrant or Timothy McVeigh & thus fell out of the news after a few days.

Regardless, the move towards the leaderless resistance model is a positive development that we can build off of going forward. What people often overlook when discussing organization is the human factor. They conceive an organization that functions like club or workplace, where the other members are essentially coworkers. This model is exactly what allows informants & other subversives to fester & destroy the organization from the inside. This is because the organization is too impersonal, members are like couvorkers when they should blood brothers. I would ally with my closest friends, who are not necessarily NS or overtly ideological at all, long before I would work with any NatSoc that I do not know & trust intimately.

The beauty of Robert Matthews' Silent Brotherhood is that it arose spontaneously from the White nationalist community of the Pacific Northwest in the 1980's. These men didn't join some random local NS group, they were brothers that trusted each other. As such, the quickly found & executed the only informant that managed to come close to the group.

The point being that you shouldn't seek to organize along vague & impersonal ideological lines with people you barely know. You should be forming a tribe, a wolfpack. Single young men should be roommates, or otherwise live together on compounds or by splitting cost on large houses (an example would be the houses that groups of influencers live in together). On larger scales, they live in small communities like RTTL, the CSA compound in Arkansas or the still active Elohim City in Oklhahoma. They should start businesses together, or assist each other with getting good employment in one another's companies. They should operate as a mutualistic society of their own. Not people who meet up once a week for random bullshit.

The fact of the matter is that you can't do it alone. Whether you're putting together the infrastructure to survive the Collapse or conducting revolutionary activities, you need friends - you need a wolfpack. Someone to provide an alibi, be a getaway driver, take care of your family when you die, continue the fight in your name.

The other fact of the matter is that the System will desperately attempt to subvert any revolutionary organization, even passive survivalist ones. It's unrealistic to establish any sort of public & open organization. Essentially, there is no traditional recruitment. If a member finds a trustworthy brother, he will vet & recruit him as a brother. You don't ask to join, you get asked. Everything is strictly personal, human.

This is the creation of a tribe, a cell, a warband. Rather than lone wolf resistance, we bring the diamonds in the rough together to form wolfpacks united by a common goal. Once the System begins to crack, these wolfpacks will know each other by their deeds & can gradually form into larger & more complex organizations. What starts as autonomous zones ("no-go zones," according to the System) will eventually coalesce into provisional governments or states.

Post-Collapse provisional states will more than likely resemble the Balkan states following the collapse of Yugoslavia, or the Republic of Ichkeria (independent Chechnya). This means control is effectively in the hands of local warlords, which can take many forms. This may be rogue elements that are no longer part of the System like local law enforcement & military units. This could be private enterprises, as in corpo rats with private military assets. This may be local anti-System leftist groups that rise to the occation. This could be simple local militias that form to fill a power vacuum. Most commonly, it will be local criminal elements which are already positioned against the system. This is all only counting true power, as in the most militarily powerful force in the area. Non-militant organizations are temporary & should be considered an effective power vacuum.

The obvious goal is for our wolfpacks to be the strongest militant group in their area. If not outright, than the infrastructure for an insurgency against either the weakened System or the local hostile elements is already in place. Once control is solidified, the wolfpack gradually takes over the tasks of government. The warband grows with it's newfound visibility & by joining with other wolfpacks until a proper State is created.

The wolfpacks are joined by a common ethos & ultimate goal, regardless of where they happen to find themselves. This is the beauty of leaderless resistance. the goals remain regardless of your specific situation. What this goal specifically is will be subject to a later article.

Go find your wolfpack & sharpen your fangs.

Im kinda out of the loop since I haven't been on substank in many months but wondering if you ever wrote an article about Organization Consul. From what I've read about them they had a real blood brotherhood under the guise of a sports equipment company. & that their time was vastly different from ours especially since they had some of the police and the courts on their side, but the formation of the blood brotherhood is what has interested me most.

This is another article taking aim at something that's generally associated with the left, and recontextualizing it.
